Corporatization In
economics,
corporatization is
the process by which private institutions transfer their ownership to a third-party company. Its popularity has increased substantially since the 1980s, especially in developed economies, and is now known as a way of closing the public sector, or transitioning to the private sector.

Historically, the United States has been a pioneer in
corporatization,
with the first
corporatization
process taking place during the Great

Depression of the 1930s. The United Kingdom, however, has been a relatively late-comer to the process. Following its privatization in 1989, the United Kingdom has only had four corporatizations.

Corporatization is often accompanied by the privatisation of government-owned assets, and ultimately the corporatization of a publicly owned company leads to its privatization.

Etymology The term corporatization was coined in the United States by John K. Galbraith during the depression era, where it referred to the transfer of ownership from the government to private firms.

Motivations

Corporatization can occur for a variety of reasons, such as:

- to save money
- to consolidate an economic sector (e.g. reduce competition)
- to provide better financial management

(e.g. improve accounting and regulatory reporting) to ease political pressure on corporations to improve corporate governance to create a better balance between the interests of labour and business to transfer ownership to a private entity that can manage an asset better than the government to force corporations to expand their operations outside of government regulation to transfer ownership

to a business that will accept lower
profit margins than a government-owned business to transfer ownership to a
