[Determination of kidney function in hypertension. Evaluation of various methods]. Blood and urinary clearance tests can be used to study the kidney function in hypertensive subjects. In order to assess the importance of the quantitative estimation of renal function by these methods, the results of blood and urinary clearance tests were compared with those obtained with the nephrotic range proteinuria as an index of chronic renal disease. The proteinuria was assessed by using gamma-globulin, albumin, N-acetyl-beta-D-glucosaminidase and alpha-amino-nitriuretic acid clearance tests. The results of the different methods were related with 24-hour protein excretion and, where available, with creatinine clearance, which was also measured by the clearance of 125I-hippuran and 125I-o-iodohippuran, respectively. The results of the blood and urinary clearance tests were compared with each other, and the methods used to evaluate the fractional excretion of the filtered proteins and the tubular reabsorption of sodium and potassium were also compared. The correlations obtained between clearance tests were quite poor and therefore the different methods were poorly correlated with each other. There were no correlations between blood and urinary clearance tests and protein excretion. It seems that blood and urinary clearance tests are not appropriate for the estimation of the renal function in hypertensive subjects and that they should be used only in those with severe disease.
