The population tally will drop below 100 million for the first time in 33 years because of a fall in the number of women giving birth, a drop in immigration to the country and a low birthrate. More than two decades of economic stagnation have also hit Japan's birthrate, which is now the lowest in the world. In a separate report, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) also forecast that Japan's population would continue to decline. "Japan's population will drop to 93.2 million by 2040 from 100.9 million in 2012," the OECD said, adding that it was the first time in almost 20 years that a developed nation's population had fallen for two consecutive years. Japan's birthrate dropped by almost half between 1987 and 2003 to an average of 1.39 children per woman, below the level needed to maintain the population. Immigration and population decline are relatively new phenomena in Japan. Until the 1950s, the population rose every year, reaching 127 million by 1987. From 1989 onwards, however, it has been a steady decline, with a dramatic acceleration beginning in 1997-1998, when it fell by 3.7 million, or 4.9 per cent, in a single year. A long period of economic stagnation, including two recessions, plus a drop in public spending, has caused the birthrate to fall further. According to Japan's National Institute of Population and Social Security Research, the birthrate for women aged 25-29 has fallen from 1.40 in 2000 to 1.10 in 2010. For women aged 30-34, the birthrate has fallen from 1.20 to 1.08. The government, which has been urging young couples to have children, believes the rate will recover in the coming decade as the economy improves. However, Japan's aging population means the fall in the birthrate will be felt for a long time. The figures showed that the number of births
