Nucleic acid repair involves direct DNA-nucleotide binding and indirect DNA-nucleotide binding via the formation of metabolites derived from the reaction of 1,4-dioxane with DNA. A previous study determined the rate constants and degree of binding of the direct DNA-nucleotide adducts. Here, the kinetics of the indirect

DNA-nucleotide adducts formed from 1,4-dioxane-acetaldehyde in the presence of nucleic acids are reported. 1,4-Dioxane was incubated with calf thymus DNA, and the hydroxylated derivative of 1,4-dioxane-acetaldehyde (dihydroxyacetaldehyde) was then acetylated to form 1,4-dioxane-acetaldehyde. After a subsequent reaction with dG, dG-dioxane, and dG-1,4-dioxane-acetaldehyde were isolated, and their stability was compared to the stability of 2'-deoxyguanosine and 6-thioguanine. The corresponding rate constants for the formation of these derivatives were determined.
