Trotter, Brian, "General motors, costs advantage vanquishes most of rivals", The Washington Times, May 27, 2005 General Motors and Fiat, two of the largest corporations on the planet, took what was thought to be the final bout in the auto industry wars of the 1990s. But a resurgent GM is back on top with a new hit at the bottom line: The all-wheel drive version of the Cadillac Seville sedan can be equipped with 20 percent more powerful engines -- from 90 to 120 horsepower -- than its predecessors, the first in a line of products that GM calls "extreme driving products." "This is a departure in how people are buying cars," said David Archer, executive director of the Center for Automotive Research. "They are learning more about the technologies that manufacturers can offer." This GM innovation allows the company to deliver a segment of buyers that buys trucks or SUVs who want a sporty version of their machine. The all-wheel drive version of the Seville makes the engine more powerful without making the vehicle heavier.

The Seville -- and the two other new GM products, the new Buick LaCrosse sport sedan and the Impala mid-size sedan -- are the new models for the 2002 model year. The Seville's all-wheel drive version will start at $24,940 and will be sold in limited numbers in the U.S. By comparison, Toyota announced a limited all-wheel drive Sienna.

Although not limited, the Seville's all-wheel drive vehicles are intended to build on GM's sales record of 500,000 all-wheel drive vehicles this year. Toyota sold 68,000 units of its all-wheel drive Sienna last year. The all-wheel drive Seville's "DuraSonic" suspension system uses electromagnet to adjust the forces under each of the wheels. The system "frees up the wheels so they can be used better, and the driver can use both feet on the accelerator pedal," said Mike Fleming, Chevrolet executive chief engineer. The front wheels are connected with a drive shaft, and the all-wheel drive system moves the drive shafts with a brake-disc governor. Automakers can put a second engine into the all-wheel drive vehicle, but they must use the variable transmission system.

GM's all-wheel drive Seville will get the new engine, which GM says should be powerful enough for most of the market for all-wheel drive vehicles.
