Verapamil, often used as a calcium antagonist for the treatment of angina pectoris, can induce torsades de pointes (TdP) in patients with coronary artery disease. A 59-year-old woman with angina pectoris, who had been treated with verapamil, started cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) because of massive chest pain. She was suspected of having myocardial infarction and was administered a bolus of 30 microg/kg of adrenaline and 50 microg/kg of morphine, but the CPR was not effective. When the CPR was restarted 30 minutes later, however, chest compression was performed efficiently and ventricular fibrillation was not sustained. About 20 minutes later, CPR restarted again and torsades de pointes was not sustained with the administration of 50 microg/kg of adrenaline and 200 microg/kg of magnesium sulphate. However, administration of 10 microg/kg of adrenaline and 20 microg/kg of magnesium sulphate was effective in preventing TdP. Thus, in this case, the administration of 50 microg/kg of adrenaline and 200 microg/kg of magnesium sulphate was insufficient to prevent the occurrence of TdP.Article content TORONTO — Ontario has become the first province to set the goal of having a minimum wage of $15 per hour by 2019, following recent hikes in minimum wages in four other provinces.
