As part of this migration, the majority of the email accounts no longer receive mail via the mail server. To provide a reliable and secure method to access email, Microsoft introduced a new protected email service, called Proxies for Protected Email (PPE). Due to this new solution, Microsoft is bringing back the support of using Office 365 ProPlus and Microsoft Outlook desktop client on mobile and tablet devices. After a migration from a traditional Outlook email client and mailbox to Proxies for Protected Email, the only available option was to configure these devices with a new SPO account. One of the advantages of using Proxies for Protected Email is the fact that it has no mail server, so there's no requirement to configure other email accounts or to switch between accounts. The following image illustrates the transition from an Outlook client to Proxies for Protected Email, which allows users to access their SPO account from their mobile devices: Despite the fact that SPO users could access their email from mobile devices, it was impossible for them to see when an email was sent to their SPO account. For example, how could they know if there was a critical document that was sent or if a contact was updated? Moreover, the only way to contact someone was to send an email or phone call. For this reason, Microsoft implemented a new 77a5ca646e
