There's no question that icons are the user's first impression of any given piece of software. Even though they are the ones that are mostly static, they are also the most important factor in any software package, especially the ones like desktop environments which influence the entire user experience. This situation is particularly true in the Windows operating system, where there are dozens of different icons in different sizes, file types and colors to represent common tasks. However, even if we are talking about operating systems other than Windows, desktop software often comes with a huge set of icons that the users can use, modify or replace. When it comes to look, everything must be aligned and organized, but those are things that CustomIcons can help you with. In the application's interface, you will find a large set of icons, which may be displayed in different ways.
