What if the sun was a big ball of plasma and our stars were just giant flares shooting off from it? Would our sky still look as beautiful and fascinating as it does today? This thought-provoking image captures the bizarre moment when some sunspots inflate into gigantic solar flares. Follow our dynamic duo on an epic journey across the sun. Witness dark, swirling plumes of plasma shoot out from these huge sunspots, give way to a cauldron of towering, twisting filaments, and finally transform into a blinding ball of plasma. It's all too rare that we see such a vivid display of sunspots erupt in such a violent, breathtaking display. A man wearing a tight-fitting shirt and carrying a bunch of flowers in the foreground strides across the barren landscape. A small hill, with its grassy top noticeably exposing the outline of a tree trunk, acts as a backdrop for the rest of the scene. How is that possible? What could be so unique and different that the very first visual pun on "sun" and "sunspots" is remarkable enough to survive for hundreds of years? The answer is simple. The human brain is unbelievably complex. Countless studies revealed that our visual cortex is the only entity among the entire human body that can form images by itself. That's right, no one told you to form images in your head. The visual cortex process visual stimuli from our eyes and coordinates all the available information. However, not all scientists believe that the visual cortex is the one responsible for constructing images we see. However, more and more research studies agree that the visual cortex serves its function the best way it can. While our eyes capture information from certain parts of our surroundings (the left and the right), the visual cortex receives different types of information. The visual cortex contains a wide variety of neural elements that compute, store, and process the information from our eyes. An image is formed inside the brain from the data flowing through a lot of these elements. By default, our brain maps the world around us according to simple shapes, allowing us to easily see the spatial relationships between objects. The content of these maps is organized on the left-right axis. The temporal axis also exists. That is, the visual cortex contains the neurons responsible for perceiving changes over time. Unlike the left-right axis, the information flow in this axis is
