If you have any questions about our Privacy Policy, you can contact us by email at Q: Does the regular setting on a camera set a point or not? I have this: Does the regular setting actually set a point or does it only override the manual shutter speed and aperture? A: The "regular setting" of the setting dial will affect the shutter speed, and to a lesser extent the aperture. A: The simple answer is that the "regular setting" on the camera - such as shutter speed and aperture/ISO- will "control" how the camera behaves, but not necessarily set points at the exact max values. Most cameras allow you to adjust manually the max values - this is referred to as "M" or manual settings. I know of some cameras that can actually allow you to adjust the actual max values with the "regular" settings for those same settings (i.e. shutter speed) - not a common practice, but does exist for those "rare" models. So, if you want a point (i.e. a fixed value) like "f/14" or "1/50" - you have to set a fixed point value using the M setting before using the "regular" settings for the same setting(s).
