A novel isoform of bradykinin receptor was identified in human heart and its expression was found to be at much lower level than the bradykinin receptor 1 isoform. Expression of mRNA for the novel isoform was found to be highly abundant in fetal heart and moderately abundant in lung. The novel isoform has an extra 30 amino acid insertion in the N-terminal extracellular domain of the bradykinin receptor 1 and the amino acid sequence deduced from the cDNA sequence of the novel isoform is identical to that of the carboxyl-terminal part of the bradykinin receptor 1. The insertion sequence might have been acquired by the last insertion of the gene for the bradykinin receptor 1. We designated this novel isoform bradykinin receptor 2. Composite materials are increasingly being used to produce automotive components in an effort to reduce weight and reduce the need for parts manufactured from metallic materials. Composite materials are also being used for other applications in transportation including aircraft and racing vehicles. Composites are broadly classified as either thermosetting composites or thermoplastic composites. The type of composite used in a given application depends primarily upon the application requirements, such as temperature and chemical resistance. In automotive applications, thermosetting composites such as polymer matrix composites are widely used to

Kaspersky Lab researchers have discovered a new advertising affiliate network that is being used to redirect users to websites offering misleading advertisements or content and redirect them to the real sites in an effort to drive the advertising revenue of the affiliate networks. The research was conducted using the legitimate Puma shopping search engine which randomly redirected users to a 'Puma Games' website through affiliate links used by the malware, resulting in users being redirected to previously unpublished games on the site such as the free Puma simulator. This method of advertising has become a popular tactic for vendors and previously was primarily used in AdWords ad campaigns. Puma sells Puma branded online games through its own website and is well known for its Puma Games website, which is one of the most popular in the industry. Puma has more than 100,000 active games and the website sees millions of unique visitors per month. The Puma Games website includes a free to use Puma simulator called 'Puma 3D', with the game being advertised on the left-hand side of the website as shown in the following image. Jogos do Puma 3D The Puma simulator game is also promoted on the Puma Games website through an 'Ask the Question' widget. Clicking on the 'Ask the Question' widget directs users to the Puma Games website instead of the real Puma website. The following image shows this behaviour. Since most people are unaware of the connection between the Puma simulator game and Puma, they click on the 'Ask the Question' widget and land on the Puma Games website, where they are told they can register to receive the latest updates on the Puma simulator. In reality, the Register & Win form is only used to redirect users to the Puma ad network. Puma offers affiliate programs to other websites, which are used to promote the same game. However, although the same game is promoted on numerous sites, only the Puma Games site shows a 'Play Game' button as shown in the following image: Puma Games has a unique registration form. When a user enters the form, the form stores login credentials. The form asks the user to log in using the stored credentials or choose a different username and password. It then redirects the user to the email address that Puma has stored as a result of this registration. On the 'Earn Money' tab of the form, users
