Taça da Liga The Taça da Liga is the annual Portuguese League Cup competition, organised by the Portuguese League for Professional Football (Primeira Liga). It is the Portuguese football equivalent of the FA Cup or League Cup. As for the domestic cup competitions, the Taça da Liga is played in a similar format to the UEFA competitions in that it consists of four rounds in which each club plays each other team once, in a knock-out competition. While the Primeira Liga clubs do not compete in the Taça da Liga, this cup is open to all clubs from the Liga de Honra (Third Division). As for the UEFA competitions, the first round is a pairwise single elimination competition, that has been played since the competition's inauguration in the 2001-02 season. The first round uses an open draw, and results are decided on penalties. The pairings for the first round are decided by ranking each team in the league and then drawing two teams from each division. The following two rounds are a single elimination knockout competition, that has been played since the competition's inauguration in the 2003-04 season. The following two rounds also uses an open draw, and results are decided on penalties. The single round uses a pairing rule, but is not set in stone; rather, it is based on the final scores from the previous season's competition. The competition has had different qualifying rounds since the establishment of the national league competitions in 1927. Between 1993 and 2002 the competition was a single elimination knockout competition. In 2003, the league in the Liga de Honra started and was played over a two-legged system. Since the 2015-16 season, there are two qualification rounds to the final, one for the first-tier, the Prime
