This copy is a separate image and, although it is displayed in the same window as the original, it is still a separate file. For example, if the original image is a scan of a colored snapshot, the copy may be a photograph of the same scene in color. You can either place the copy on a new layer or move the original layer to the copy. The method you choose to do so depends on what part of the image you're editing. To place the copy, choose File⇒Open and navigate to where you saved the file. When you open the file, Photoshop will ask you to choose what type of file to open, such as RAW, Photoshop File, or Photoshop (.psd or.psdx) (depending on the file type). Select the file and click Open. When you place the copy on a new layer, it's automatically stored on the Inverted Layers palette because this is the default setting when you insert a new layer. Choose Layer⇒New Layer to open the New Layer dialog box and select the Copy option. In the Format section, use the options in Figure 1-1 to define the size of the new layer. For editing purposes, the new layer is invisible, so it isn't added to the finished image. However, once you have placed the layer and created your edits, you can save the image and return to the original. Saving the file saves the new layer with the changes you made and allows you to apply the edits to the original. To save

Trump has said in the past that he doesn't hate Muslims. But in a recent interview with The New York Times, he equivocated when asked whether he was saying Muslim Americans have a special place in his heart. In the interview, he said, "I'm not saying any Muslims. I'm saying radical Islam." The President's words became public in a story by Maggie Haberman, The Times' White House correspondent, who has interviewed Trump for the past two months as part of a project in which she has spoken to former White House officials, Cabinet members and members of Trump's family. In an interview with The Times, President Donald Trump appears to break with a past statement in which he said Muslims "love America." Trump suggests he does not hate all Muslims and instead condemns only "radical Islam." (May 10) The seemingly contradictory comments elicited strong reaction from Trump's critics, including New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio. De Blasio, a Democrat, has said that Trump has stoked racial divisions and played to and furthered racist attitudes. In a tweet posted Saturday, de Blasio wrote that "putting Islam in quotes" is not the same thing as hating all Muslims, and he said the President's comments represent the "real enemy of the American people: white nationalism." But President Trump on Sunday offered a different view, saying he has "been saying no Muslim. I have been saying very strongly, 'Islam hates us.' " Trump added: "Now, you know, you could interpret that in so many different ways. But at the same time, I'm not saying no Muslim. I'm saying radical Islam." Haberman's reporting for the story focused on tensions between the President and his staff, which she said have become more confrontational during the first months of his presidency. In the newspaper, she said some current and former senior administration officials consider the President to be "frustrated" by his staff and "losing faith in his advisers." The officials said Trump is especially tired of chief strategist Stephen Bannon and senior policy adviser Stephen Miller, she wrote. In addition, she reported that a small group of Cabinet officials and other staff — including White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus, Defense Secretary James Mattis and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin — remain
