“For us, it was an important step to use real-life data rather than data from the previous generation of the engine,” says David Rutter, Senior Producer at EA Sports. “The data we collect from the real-life players is used to ensure the game moves and feels like it should in the gameplay.” Key aspects of the new “HyperMotion” Engine include: Native Player Motion Capturing This technology allows the game engine to automatically detect and track player movement on the pitch. The player’s movement is defined by their real-life movement and not by the player pose or motion model from the previous generation. The algorithm further analyzes gameplay and can detect when players are in possession of the ball in order to understand pass back patterns and attack patterns. Real Player Physics New code has been developed to simulate the true physics of real-life football interactions. The new code uses an artificial intelligence algorithm that drives the animations of players, passing and tackling. As the players move on the pitch, the physics engine uses motion capture data to determine the players’ real-life movements and behaviors, including what are called “predictive accelerations.” Decisions The engine is dynamically optimized based on the AI decisions it makes. For example, if a player is in possession of the ball, the engine will make decisions based on high-stakes battles and whether a pass is open or close to the goal line. The system also adjusts the player’s movement based on the pitch, weather conditions, play field size and much more. Athlete Interaction Rutter says that the team at EA Sports also emphasized getting the ball to behave more like it does in real life. "It's important to make the game feel like it is in motion, so we had to look at the ball," he said. "We had to understand that in real-life, the ball behavior is not the same as in previous FIFA titles, for example, not all balls travel exactly in the same way. When a player controls the ball, we make sure the ball moves accordingly, making the ball dynamic." In terms of player interaction with the ball, Rutter says the team at EA Sports worked with David Beckham's Beckhams4Ever partner, Dr. Tim Tallent, to develop the interaction between players
