It is often said that throwing a thunderbolt in the face of others is a not-unusual behaviour among humans. Yet, throwing thunderbolts seems most of the times to be an admired attribute of some deities who are e.g. of Greek or Norse mythology.

However, it is much less often reported on what happens when the thunderbolt is hurled oneself.

Especially when the thunderbolt is an own thunderbolt, as for instance when being fired from a cannon. It is known that such a thunderbolt is difficult to handle. For one thing, it has a great velocity, like other thunderbolts. Moreover, it is unknown where it lands. It might land on the head, and that might well be a very dangerous landing. At any rate, in order to be able to throw own thunderbolts, it is desirable to have one or more means which are capable of throwing the thunderbolt with sufficient velocity, accuracy and such a risk-free behaviour that it lands on the intended target. For instance, the user may be no more than a rifleman in the same way as the longbow-men were in the Middle Ages. It is also advantageous to be able to be able to carry out the throwing of own thunderbolts within
